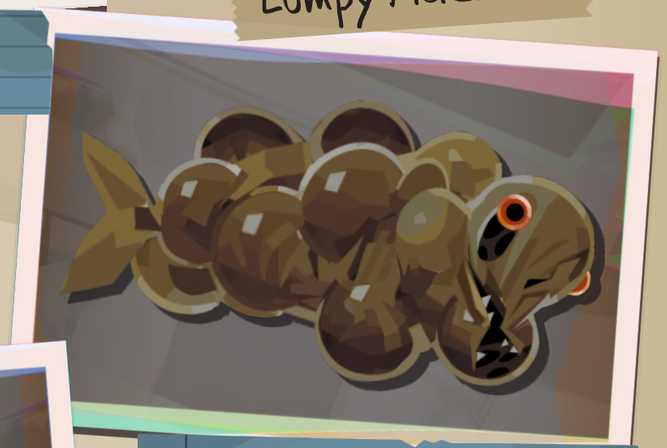
~~NOTEBOOK~~

FISH SPECIES

Blue Mackerel

Practically worthless but enough to stave off hunger.

Lumpy Mackerel



A writhing mass of lumps, twisting and pulling their way under the scales of their vessel. How long can it have lived like this?

Grotesque Mackerel

Corrupted scales and bulbous eyes - like nothing you've ever seen before.

Many-Eyed Mackerel

Gill plates dotted with eyeballs. Superfluous but scanning, frantically. All eyes see right through you.

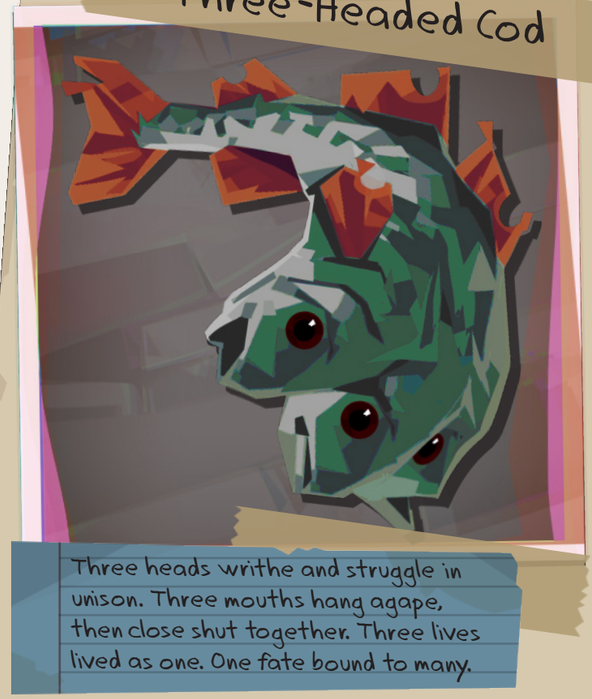
Cod

Plentiful and basic.

Fanged Cod

Deviantly sharp teeth, with chunks of smaller fish lodged between. A hunger in its eyes.

Three-Headed Cod



Three heads writhe and struggle in unison. Three mouths hang agape, then close shut together. Three lives lived as one. One fate bound to many.

All-Seeing Cod

Staring outwards, unblinking. Eyes borrowed from a larger being but not the mind to process what it sees.

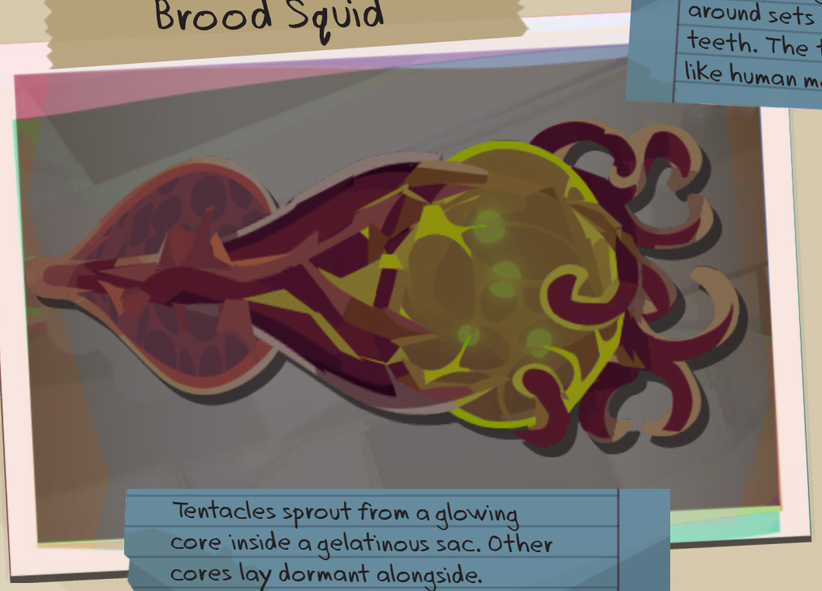
Arrow Squid

Rises from the depths at night to feed - or be fed upon.

Snag Squid

Tasting tongues writhe wildly around sets of yellowed, crooked teeth. The top row are flattened like human molars.

Brood Squid



Tentacles sprout from a glowing core inside a gelatinous sac. Other cores lay dormant alongside.

Grey Eel

A slimy creature, tainted with the silt and muck of the seabed.

Barbed Eel

A spine broken with sharp angles and crooked curves. A row of teeth bent on revenge.

Host Eel

Numerous glowing shapes flicker and squirm behind a distended ribcage. The rest of the fish is withered and drained.

Gulf Flounder

A pathetic, cowardly bottom dwelling fish.

Riddled Flounder

Baggy skin perforated with countless cavities. A singular, shapeless mass spreads underneath.

Cyclopean Flounder

A sprawling, jellied mass spills from a single eye socket. What appears to be a dark pupil is in fact the center of an egg.

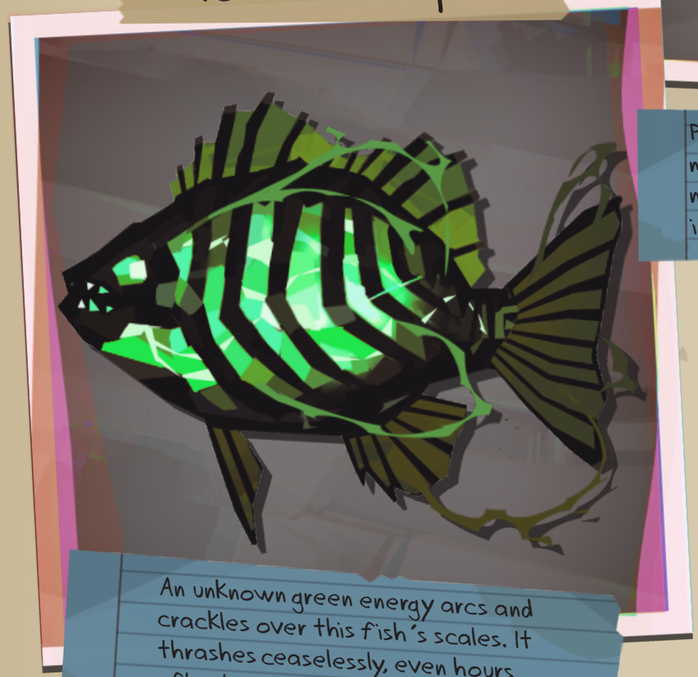
Black Grouper

A short, stocky fish with mottled black colouring. Perfect camouflage in the black waters of night.

Tusked Grouper

Pig-like tusks protrude from the mouth of this ravenous brute. With no eyes to speak of, it attacks indiscriminately.

Voltaic Grouper



An unknown green energy arcs and crackles over this fish's scales. It thrashes ceaselessly, even hours after being pulled from the water.

Stingray

Good eating but requires careful preparation.

Shard Ray

The stone skin of this ray is moulded around a black crystal shard. The ock fragments articulate and grind gether.

Sailfish

Impossibly quick, but the bill and sail don't sell for much.

Sallow Sailfish

A sickly, pallid color coats the scales of this normally sleek and shiny fish. Clouded eyes belie the disease spreading underneath.

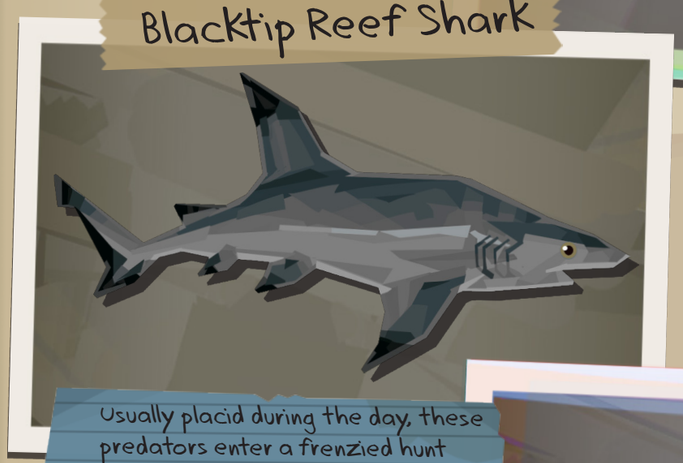
Bronze Whaler

A beautifully coloured, but deadly predator.

Bloodskin Shark

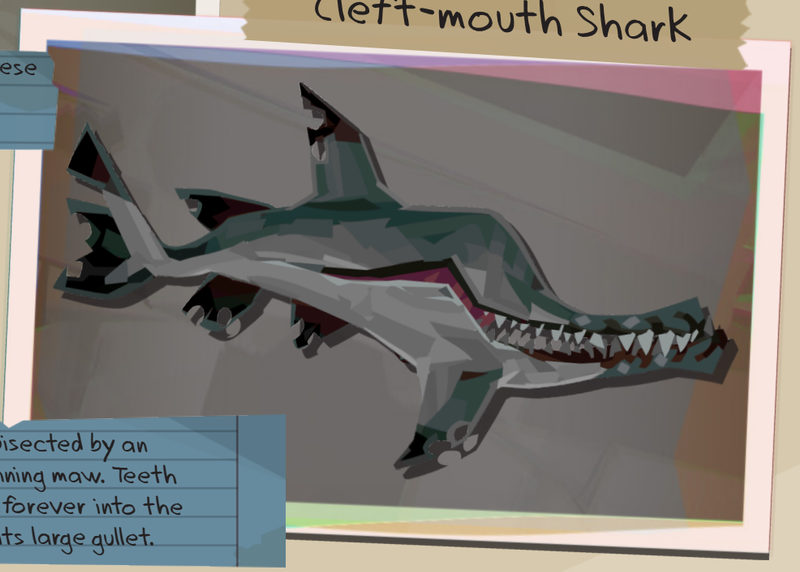
Tendons and sinews stretch over the fins of this bloodied predator. Powerful jaws are clad in exposed muscle.

Blacktip Reef Shark



Usually placid during the day, these predators enter a frenzied hunt when the sun sets.

Cleft-mouth Shark



A large body bisected by an enormous, grinning maw. Teeth stretch down forever into the blackness of its large gullet.

Common Crab

A crusty carapace and clicking claws. Caught in a cage close to the coast.

Fiddler Crab

A relatively normal sized crab with a preposterously large claw. The claw can grip with incredible strength, but the arm is fragile and can be snapped off with ease.

Rock Crab

A popular crab for eating.

Decorator Crab

Having covered itself in detritus, this creature hardly resembles a crab at all.

Crown of Thorns

With many heavily spined arms, this starfish is extremely hardy. It's a destructive pest and not worth selling.

Blue Crab

Also Known as Swimmer Crabs, these colourful crabs have two flattened legs that act as paddles, allowing them to swim very effectively.

Oceanic Perch

Also Known as the Rose fish, this brightly coloured little fish has sharp, thorny fins.

Gnashing Perch

Eyeless and mindless. Driven only by the desire to consume. A purpose satiated many times over.

Tiger Mackerel

Slightly more substantial than other mackerel species but harder to catch.

Flayed Mackerel

Rended flesh with muscle and bone exposed. This gory mess of a fish can't have lived like this for long.

Bearded Mackerel

The wispy tendrils sprouting from its mouth and flanks continue to writhe long after the fish has stopped flailing.

Black Sea Bass

The dark bands on its flanks help it camouflage, making this a fearsome night predator - if you're a small shrimp.

Scouring Bass

Shapes swirl inside bulging, clouded eyes. Blinded by the light of the surface, but perfectly suited to searching the depths.

Stonefish

This miserable looking creature carries a dangerous amount of venom in its dorsal fins. Handle with care.

Gelatinous Stonefish

Flesh and scales intent on shuffling away from a creature struggling to maintain its mortal form.

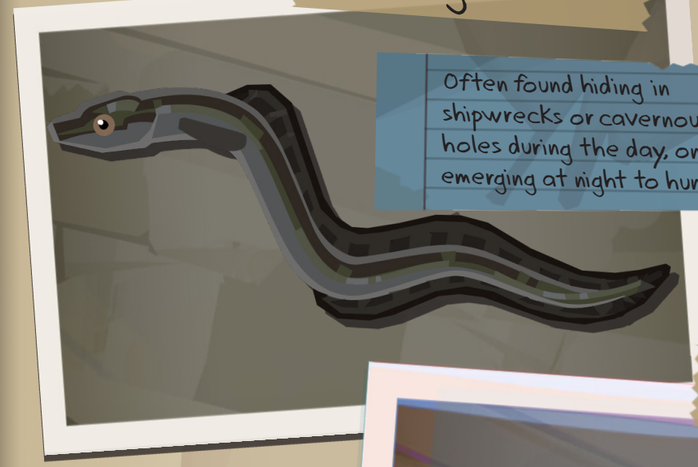
Blackmouth Salmon

You've promises to keep, Blackmouth. And miles to swim before you sleep.

Decaying Blackmouth

A shimmering blackness permeates the flesh of this relentless fish. Muscles atrophied and decaying, but still it swims on.

Conger Eel



Often found hiding in shipwrecks or cavernous holes during the day, only emerging at night to hunt.

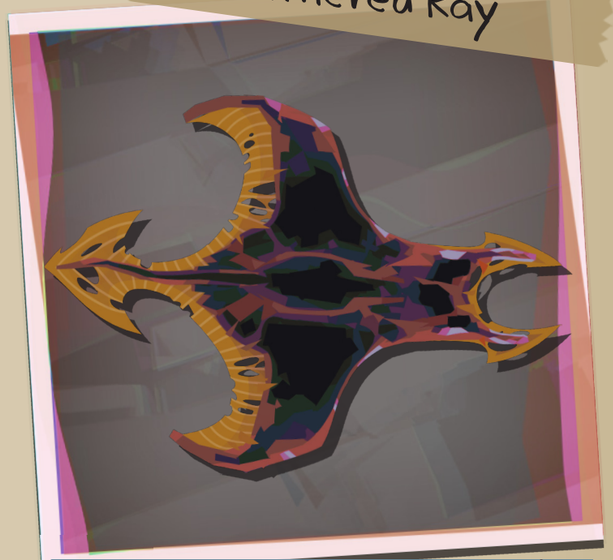
Sprouting Eel

An eruption of crystalline growths burst from its skin. Sharp shapes clatter and resonate together.

Devil Ray

Slow moving and slow growing, these rare rays don't make for particularly good eating.

Withered Ray



Rotten webbing spans the wings of this large ray. Sinews stretch and snap as it thrashes in futility.

Sturgeon

A primitive looking fish with hard, spiky plates lined up along its back.

Translucent Sturgeon

The simple clockwork mechanisms of life laid bare as a tenuous, skeletal existence.

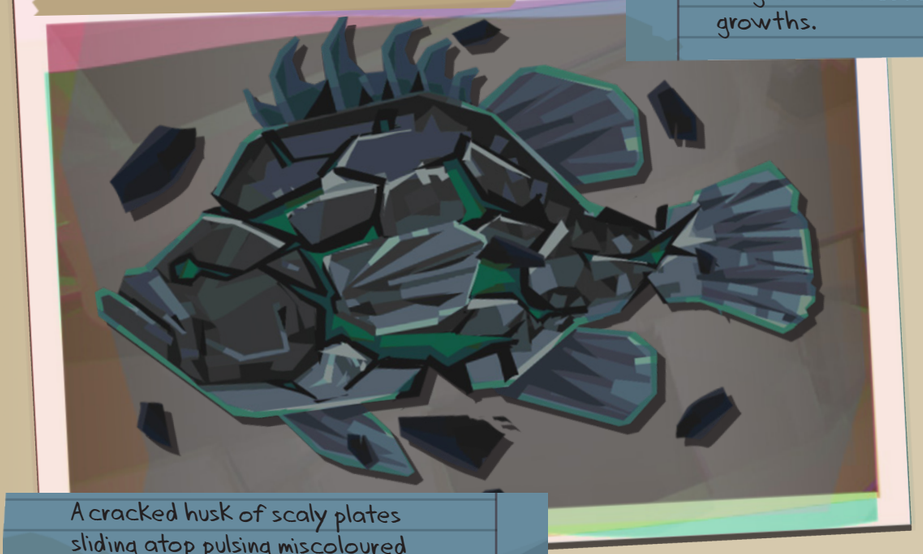
Wreckfish

Typically inhabiting caves and shipwrecks, these fish can grow big enough to eat small sharks.

Bony Wreckfish

Encased in bony protrusions and struggling to move its encumbered fins. Its gills are almost sealed shut by the growths.

Shattered Wreckfish



A cracked husk of scaly plates sliding atop pulsing miscoloured flesh.

Aurora Jellyfish

Illuminating the netherworld with a dull glow. With few predators, this species is spreading rapidly.

Parhelion Jellyfish

Two spires of light shine from within its hood. Stinging spiked tentacles trail below.

Fanged Cod

Small, with disproportionately large teeth. This slender fish has barely any meat on it.

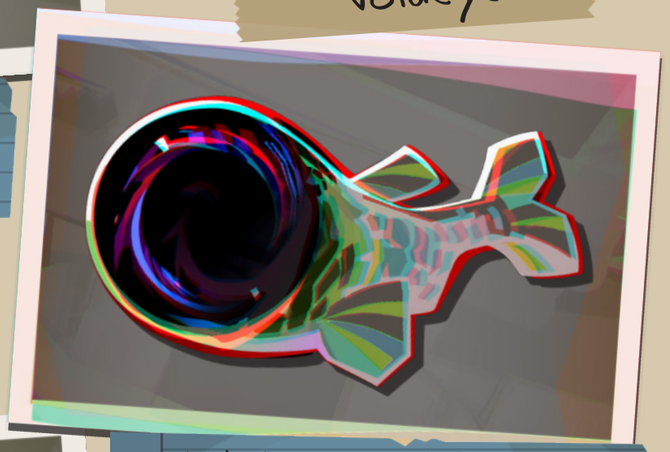
Cursed Fangtooth

A small and feeble mind, easily conquered. Now, brought screaming from the depths, it lies powerless.

Barreleye

A bizarre creature with a transparent head, housing two tubular eyes that can rotate to point upwards as well as forwards.

Voideye



Inside its eye, a perpetual pattern repeats. Red cyclones meld through shimmering green swirls. The abyss burns through you.

Firefly Squid

This tiny, sparkling squid spends most of its time in the deep ocean, rising to the surface as it nears the end of its life.

Radiant Squid

A beacon from the depths below. A glimpse of a new sky.

Red Snapper

A very popular eating fish, often found hanging around rocky coastal waters and reefs.

Blood Snapper

Blood leaks endlessly from under its scales, pooling beneath it no matter where it's placed.

Giant Amphipod

After spending years scavenging fallen carcasses on the ocean floor, this crustacean has grown extremely large.

Ruptured Vessel

Willing host, or sacrificial receptacle?

Loosejaw

With red searchlights below its eyes, this predator hunts with needle-like teeth. Its stomach can expand to hold prey larger than itself.

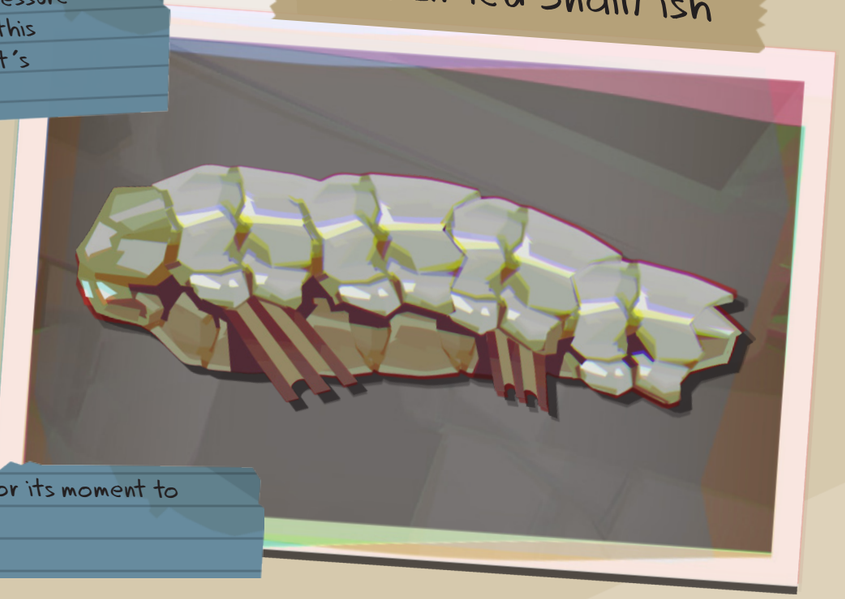
Perished Loosejaw

A few ragged scraps of skin hang like cobwebs from its fins. Its exposed muscles are riddled with small white worms.

Snailfish

Adapted to suit the high pressure environment of the deep, this fish begins to implode as it's dragged to the surface.

Calcified Snailfish



Waiting in dormancy for its moment to arrive.

Coral Grouper

Commonly found hovering above offshore reefs, this large fish ambushes smaller fish that dare leave the protection of the coral.

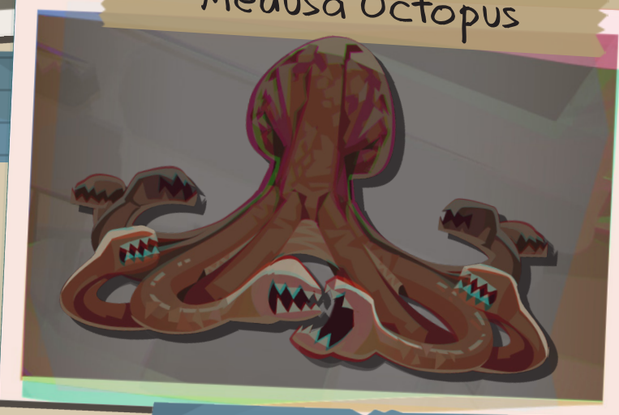
Consumed Grouper

Once dazzling skin now bleached and eroded. It barely resists, relieved at a final end.

Glowing Octopus

This remarkable octopus emits light from its suckers in a swirling, twinkling pattern.

Medusa Octopus



Eight snapping mouths crawl over each other at the behest of a silent master.

Anglerfish

Dangling a bright lure in front of its open mouth, this deep-sea predator preys on the curious.

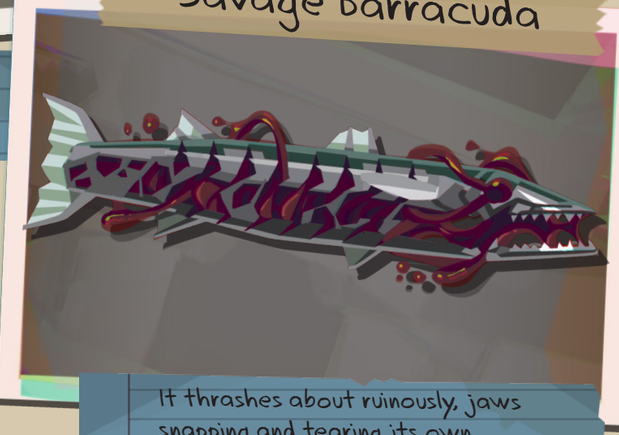
Bursting Anglerfish

The deep faces its own consequences of creation. In the darkness, brutality becomes the ultimate filter.

Barracuda

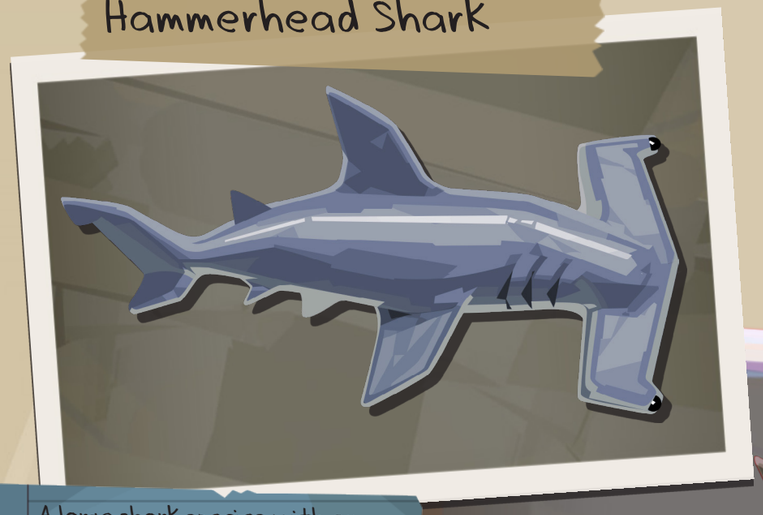
This ferocious fish is capable of great bursts of speed, and hunts by biting its prey clean in half.

Savage Barracuda



It thrashes about ruinously, jaws snapping and tearing its own flesh apart. A body sundered by ravenous hatred.

Hammerhead Shark



A large shark species with an iconic silhouette. These animals have incredibly good eyesight for hunting.

Gazing Shark

Huge bulbous eyes move about on large fleshy stalks, siphoning energy from its body. Its search is not over.

Grey Mullet

A plain fish, often found in sandy or muddy areas. One of a few species that can survive in brackish water.

Entwined Mullet

Twisting, twitching tendrils sprout from the gill plates of this little fish. They heave in unison, moving the fish against its will.

Spiny Lobster

When threatened, these delicious creatures can rub their long antennae against their body, producing a loud screeching sound.

Giant Mud Crab

Highly cannibalistic, these crabs have been known to devour their soft shelled brothers after molting.

Horseshoe Crab

It looks freakish and unnatural, but this ancient relic of the past sells well.

Scarlet Prawn

Found in the depths of most oceans. Swarms of them can consume crabs and other small fish.

Tarpon

A powerful fish capable of bursts of energy. Well suited to dashing into the mangrove roots to take cover.

Blistered Tarpon

Scales given way to bubbling flesh. A surface dweller singled out and cleansed by the sun.

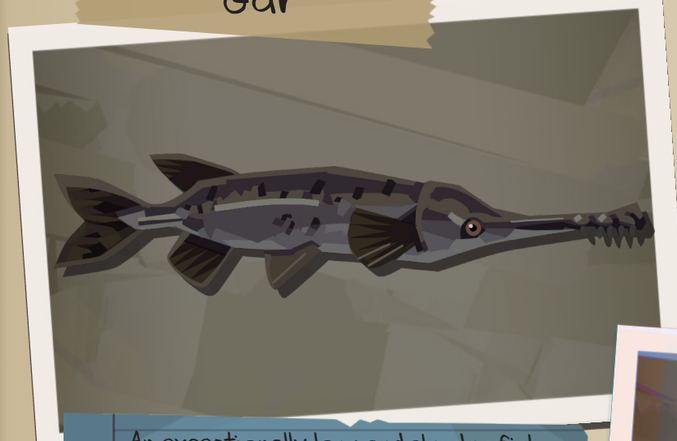
Sergeant Fish

Sometimes called the Snook, this drab fish feeds on anything smaller than itself - including juveniles of its own species.

Vortex Interloper

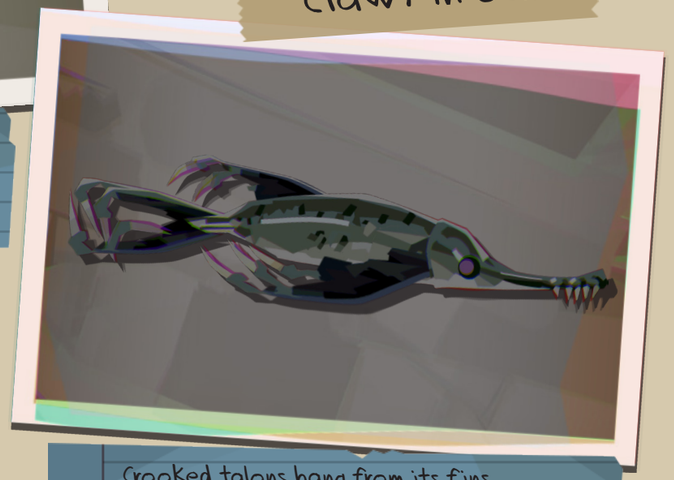
A slow swirl twists its body, stretching it towards an unseen dimension.

Gar



An exceptionally long and slender fish. Strong scales stretch down the length of its body.

Clawfin Gar



Crooked talons hang from its fins. Periodically they shudder and come together, grasping like a hand.

Longfin Eel

A long eel with delicate fins. Spends the day coiled around the roots of the mangrove trees, but emerges at night to hunt.

Twinned Eels

Endlessly pulling away, but torn apart they would surely perish. Two spiteful siblings splitting at the seams.

Catfish

Equipped with sensing barbels, this large scavenger can detect morsels hidden in the mud.

Nightwing Catfish

Hooked barbels seek out prey in the twisting mangroves. A once sluggish fish given haste upon crimson fins.

Armored Searobin

A small fish with angular armored plates. It has sensory barbs under its body that help it detect prey on the seabed.

Ossified Searobin

A small fish with angular armored plates. It has sensory barbs under its body that help it detect prey on the seabed.

Cusk Eel

A miserable looking eel, often found hiding in cracks and crevices.

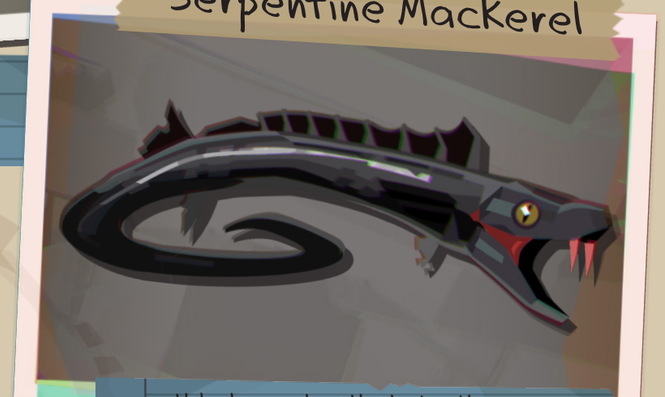
Infernal Eel

Grown fat from countless corpses that rest in the deep. The harbinger of a sick mercy for lost souls.

Snake Mackerel

Slender, with dull black eyes and a long snout. A greedy jaw full of long, sharp teeth.

Serpentine Mackerel



It lashes out with its teeth, its tail. A hissing rises from its mouth, and then from the water around you.

Pale Skate

One of the deepest-living species of skate, thought to use hydrothermal vents as incubators for its egg cases.

Defaced Skate

Bones replace cartilage and erupt through soft skin. A frightening new form begins to emerge.

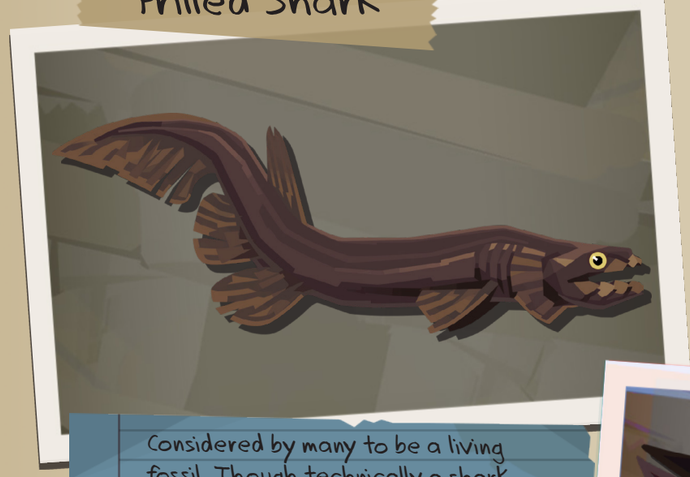
Ghost Shark

Sometimes called the Chimera, this phantom of the deep lacks the teeth of other sharks, instead having three bony grinding plates fused to its skull.

Rapt Shark

A grinning maw turned upwards to the sky. Wing-like fins, ready to take flight.

Frilled Shark



Considered by many to be a living fossil. Though technically a shark, it swims like an eel, hunting prey with 300 needle-like teeth.

Twisted Shark

Three tails that twist and turn.
Three unite behind the head.
Thrice the body that must be fed.

Anchovy

The tiny anchovy is harvested in great quantities by man and creature alike - but in their numbers, they will persevere.

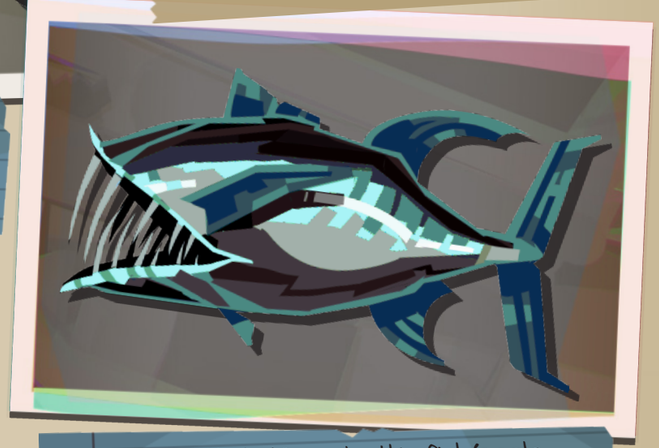
Anchovy King

...and in their numbers, they will rise.

Blackfin Tuna

These popular sport fish can prove challenging to catch. Their strong, muscular bodies make for good eating.

Razormouth Tuna



Half teeth, half muscle, this fish's sole purpose is the pursuit of its unfortunate prey.

Moonfish

Brilliant, glittering scales give this fish its name. Uniquely, it's the only known warm-blooded fish.

Skeletal Moonfish

Chittering bones still operate a ghostly body impossibly devoid of organs.

Viperfish

Hovering in wait above the sea floor, these long fish bite and attempt to swallow whatever random prey they encounter.

Decrepit Viperfish

Gnashing teeth are the only hint that this withered body still holds life. An urge to bite that persists in perpetuity.

Collapsed Viperfish

A rejection of the light - or a return to the ways of the deep?

Rattail

Found at great depths, these are the most abundant of all deep-sea fish. They gather in large numbers around structures in the deep.

Congealed Rattail

The flesh of this deep dweller has turned to a thick ooze, secreting an oily gel that covers its entire body.

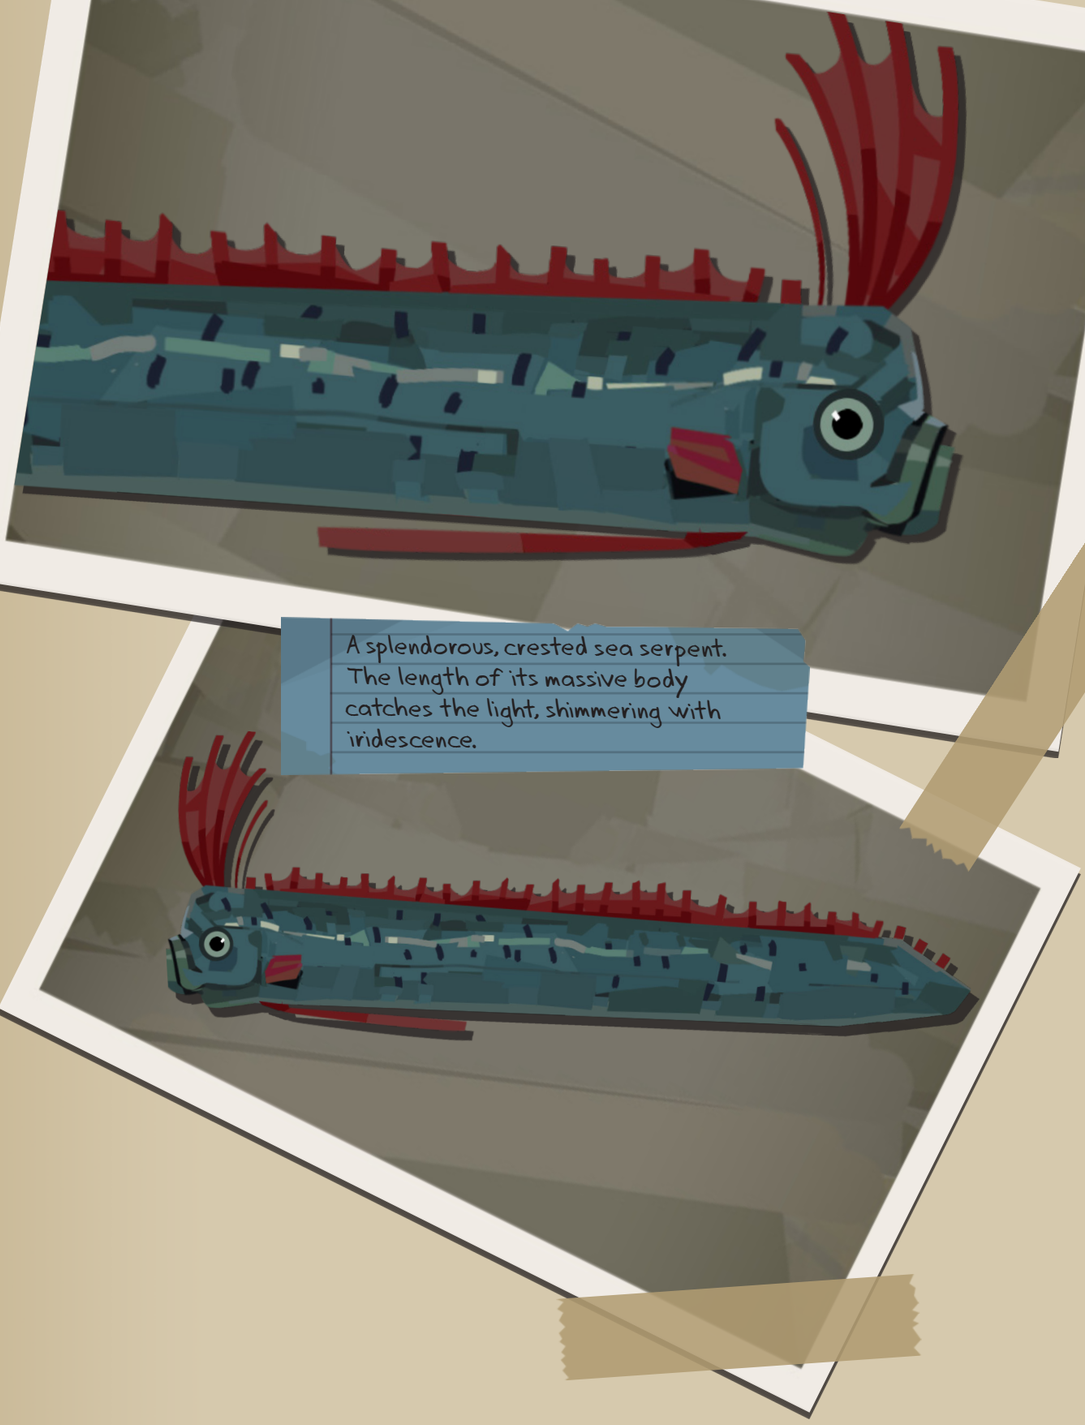
Ocean Sunfish

Though this giant is the heaviest known bony fish in the world, its slow, unarmored body is vulnerable to sharp teeth and hungry jaws.

Charred Sunfish

Scales chipped and flaking, its crackling body is hot to the touch.

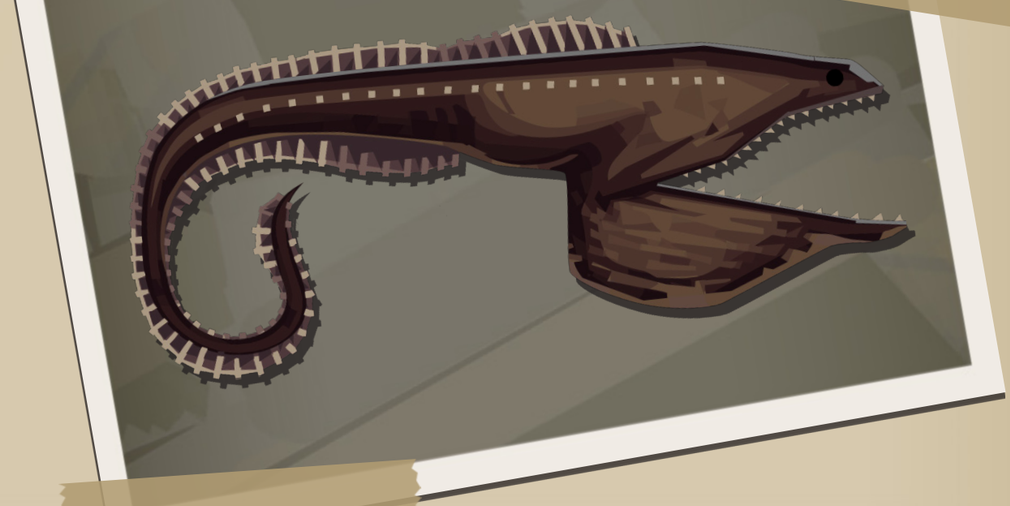
Oarfish



A splendorous, crested sea serpent. The length of its massive body catches the light, shimmering with iridescence.

Gulper Eel

Few humans have ever seen this eel. Its great, gulping jaw can open wider than the length of its body.



Goliath Tigerfish

Fearsomely predatory, this gigantic fish is also one of the most aggressive. Its teeth are so large that they punch holes through the opposing jaw.

Coelacanth

An ancient giant, battered by the years gone by. Its slow eyes swivel and look at you mournfully.